2024: REVIEW OF THE YEAR

OUR AMAZINGLY HELPFUL MARKET UPDATE

2024 REVIEW

KELLY'S HOT TAKE

2024! It was a tale of two halves. It started off busily. Then came the economic, political and sectoral shenanigans. And our enquiry levels turned from busy to bananas.

The open market may have been a different story, but in our sector, rates remained within a reasonable ballpark, and lenders were lending as usual. With the BIG exception of the Government's Mortgage Guarantee Scheme, the number of Shared Ownership loans been pretty much business as usual.

While at TMP, we shifted up a gear. Here's our take on the year.

Quick recap: mortgage rates began notching down in January, and continued to do so, reaching the September 2024 mini-budget. And although they're now possessedcurtly of a bit of a wobble, they're still lower than last year. And pre-fixed mortgages were still being taken out on the historically low rates. Which meant that the number of applications in Shared Ownership was more than expected (quite) for another couple of years, but things started off last year at 4.5% and less is more.

Since just before the start of last year, average rates have been on a downward trend. The drop in rates wasn't smooth sailing, and that's based on real rates, not headlines. They started off last year at 4.5% and less is more. Above is U.S. Which is good: it's stability with a downward trend. Which is also good. Because it's above as good as we can ask for right now and although the BoE base rate has been cut twice, it's still relatively high. Which means those who had reverted themselves and the outlook is more stable.

Looking ahead to this year, odds are on for another base rate drop of half a percent. The Bank of England's next meeting is on 6th February. But considering the signs it's making are looking a bit slow at the moment, we'll just have to wait and see.

Active lenders in SO

We began last year with 29 lenders, and we're starting the year with the same number. In other words, things are rock-steady stable when it comes to lenders. Which is a good thing in Shared Ownership, as more is one, but most have had (what they might perceive as) their fill of SO. Which is why the number of lenders we're now officially talking about, THREE YEARS ON, by the way!, Anyway. Truthfully, 29 lenders is more than enough. Only 10 of them place 90% of applications with the rest that are already active in the sector.

We've got a couple more lenders offering 95% mortgages, which is great news for buyers. But that's really only true to see. It's a good sign of an understanding of the nuances of the market. But the number of 95% mortgages isn't quite enough to move that dial up to 95% to a more worth making.

Hopefully this trend will continue, because 95% is the sweet spot for affordability and getting on the homeowner ladder. The demand simply isn't there.

Sub 25% lenders

2024 saw a few sub 25% lender hit-and-outs, but the number of sub 25% lenders remained. And that the need for customers to buy a 10% deposit remains very rare. Especially outside of London.

So, although there's been an uptick over the last few months, it's not quite the return to pre-the-foreseeable future. The demand simply isn't there.

Dominant lenders by rate

Lands are all the big kids on the block (with us at any rate). But over time, lenders' services change. Some lenders come and go. Some, like the late SO disaster years, the world tend to get swamped and then disappear, unlikely to be seen again. Others are consistently dominant.

Last year we didn't see anything like the end of nasty to Buy, early buy changes, or the offer of Help to Buy. But we did see a couple of new lenders. Those bring just huge amounts or lending. There's been nothing to cause major behaviour changes, but there's been a lot of quiet activity behind the scenes. Which is what does feel like now is to be.

Average share: 90 days

There's been a drop, kind it's probably fair to say. Higher interest rates have played a big role in that. After all, the size of a share a customer can afford is directly linked to the amount they can borrow, which is linked to their income.

After a brief spike, they stayed after the affordability changes, but that rate probably always going to happen. Since then, the average share has continued to fall. But not on the ground feeling is that this is due to the Help to Buy scheme coming to an end by the end of this January they might by the 40% mark again. One to watch.

Bank of England base rate

Back at the start of last year, the Bank of England's base rate was a whopping 5.25%. It ended the year at 4.75%. And hopefully it ends this year at 4.25% or lower.

August saw a 0.5% cut, then in November 0.25%. It was cut again to 4.75%, where it still stands.

That's hardly a fireball, but then shops were already expecting a cut in August, so no huge surprises. Distressed borrowers is dominated movement, and even a little is nice to see. Let's hope see conditions for another drop this year. Come true.

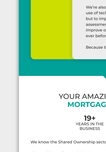
Enquiry levels

Busy. To bustier. In a whole new level of busy. That's the story of our enquiry levels during 2024. We've never known anything like it. Applications, yes. Enquiries, not to mention conversations, and new brands were set at the smallest month after month.

Since 2020, the pattern had been an enquiry heavy start to the year, a teetering off during the first half of the year, and then a pick-up in activity back to the Christmas. 2024 bucked the trend. Big time.

In last year's round up we talked about an unexpected January spike. And that spike ended up lasting all year. Even December was busy. Which is unheard of. Especially with the economic headwinds.

The affordability changes may have meant that lenders started to receive all enquiries, and that's gone to show just how much more affordable SO is than the open market. We've previously squared it from a late perspective. If that's the case, what we're now seeing is people who've been saving for a while. Ready for real? There's been a shortlived going on in Shared Ownership.



Loan To Value

Generally speaking – we're drawing mean, median and mode averages here – during 2024, people borrowed between 90 and 95% of the value of the property. At TMP, we might have had a few more 95% LTV loans than the industry trend. Could average out on many lines elsewhere, but it's rare.

What we have seen is an increase in gifted deposits. We don't have figures on this yet (we'll be looking at it in the future), but anecdotal estimates would be that around a third of those are coming through with gifted deposits.

Which begs the question of what's worth up, in a sector, being rock more pragmatic and practical than most. Which is why we're always there with advice & don't think to take another look at why we are declining people with adverse?

Our prediction for 2025 is that details like these will be more and more important, as affect to get a better outcome for buyers.

LOANS TO VALUE
	Median LTV	Median LTV - Mean LTV

June	90	89.08
July	90	87.92

House price index

With the average house price in the UK now sitting at £290,000 (according to the Halifax figures), property prices have risen by 3.4% over the past year. In 2025, the average UK house price is set to rise by 3.5%.

According to Dwelly "Buyers and sellers remain cautious, but the market is showing numbers over 2025, having delayed many decisions in the face of higher mortgage rates. Many buyers and sellers have now accepted that the drivers a substantial growth in house prices over 2024, with the end of year sales pipeline at its highest for four years."

Debt To Income

The measure for TP has changed this year. Previously we looked at the total debt as an available some borrowers would afford affordable but as expected we're seeing a slow, gradual increase in the number of loans that TMP have coming through with a DTI in excess of 6x.

Let's not forget, 2024 was a landmark year for affordability. The affordability changes that were method for how we look at affordability and we expect that, as 4% becomes more and more embedded in the lending criteria of mainstream, they'll start things at that we start seeing DTI returning to its old levels.
